Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a liquid developer used for developing latent electrostatic images in electrophotography, electrostatic recording and the like, particularly a contact or no-contact type liquid developer used for developing latent electrostatic images in an electrophotography method. 2. Discussion of the Background Electrophotographic method is commonly used for image formation in electrophotographic apparatus. In this method, an electrostatic latent image is formed on a photoconductive material, the latent image is developed using a developer containing a coloring agent such as a pigment or dye, the developed image is then transferred onto a recording medium such as paper, and the image is fixed on the recording medium by application of heat, pressure or solvent vapor. Generally, carbon black is used as the coloring agent in the developer, and optionally a resin or a wax is incorporated in the developer for the purpose of improving the dispersibility of the coloring agent. In recent years, a contact or no-contact type liquid developer is widely used to ensure high image quality. In this kind of liquid developer, high image quality is obtained, but only small amounts of the developer are required, and there is a possibility of leakage of the developer. To reduce this possibility of leakage, a fluorine-based polymer or resin, alkyl group-containing resin, and the like is incorporated into the developer to improve its dispersibility and leakage preventing ability. To increase the fixability of the developer, waxes are incorporated into the developer, but a problem still remains that the waxes tend to segregate or separate from the developer, causing blurring of
